MRS. WHARTON.

The Thirty-seventh Day of the Poisoning Trial.

Gaping, Excited and Cynical Balloons in Court.

SUMMING UP TO THE JURY.

Appearance and Attitude of the Accused.

The State Attorney's Denunciation and the Eulogy and Eloquence of Mr. Hagner.

Courteous Compliment to Miss Nellie.

ANNAPOLIS, Md., Jan. 17, 1872.

The Wharton trial has reached that stage at which public interest is culminating in the most intense excitement.

The evidence being all in the most recent are at last proclaiming boldly their opinions upon the case.

They are as varied as the leaves in Vallambrosa. "Guilty," "not guilty," "innocent," "outraged," "persecuted," are words which compose the vocabulary of nine-tenths of the population.

The railway trains, the steamboats and the public promenade resound with the unceasing cry of "guilty," "not guilty," "innocent," "outraged," "persecuted."

The sweet lips of the reigning beauty will babble the later with the facility of a pharmacist.

Crowds besiege the nondescript equipage which conveys the prisoner from the protecting isolation of his prison cell to the almost unbearable scrutiny of the gaping assemblage in the Court House, and but for the determined attitude of the bailiffs, men would have stood on each other's heads to-day, so great was their eagerness to secure standing ground in the little old court room which has thus far answered for all the moderate requirements of justice in Anne Arundel county.

No trial within the recollection of the oldest inhabitant has so entirely absorbed public attention or so fearfully developed human passions.

The silver-haired octogenarian will discuss with intemperance the evidences of her guilt, while the younger and more tender-hearted barrister will pour out evidence and the principles which govern circumstantial evidence as conclusive of her innocence.

JUDGMENT OF THE GENTLE SEX.

The ladies, who are ever most unflinching where one of their own sex is to be judged, had formed their opinions with rare exceptions long before issue was joined, and with the obstinacy so beautiful when rightly directed, but so ugly when improperly exercised, have steadily refused to be governed by any evidence offered in her defence.

They jump to conclusions, and are not amenable to any rule of logic yet devised by man. They hang over the victim with the glittering eyes and scarce-concealed longing of the tigress, and were her fate entrusted to their hands the end would not be problematical.

The Court met at ten o'clock this morning, with all the Judges on the bench. The prisoner, with her usual attendants, entered the court room a few moments before the appointed hour and took her usual seat. The ladies, however, were not present.

who come here from all parts of the country; across the Continent and from the North, during this intense season, to testify before the jury.

Now, gentlemen, let me say a word.

ABOUT THE LAW OF THIS MATTER.

I am sure you will all agree that it is a matter of great importance to you, but I have taken upon me to say a few words to you about this case, to relieve my brothers, and I know you would not excuse me if I failed fairly to show you what is in my mind.

Authorities were quoted by him as illustrating his position and establishing the points of law upon which he rested his case. He then proceeded to say that, if there is needed a higher proof of this good character, it is found in one circumstance that has transpired before our eyes.

A HIGH COMPLIMENT TO NELLIE WHARTON.

We have seen this poor girl, her daughter, here day after day, sitting in the witness box, and with this mother, without doubt or fear of her entire innocence. We are at last in a position to see the truth, and we are at last in a position to see the truth.

take, when we remember that the first man born since the second. No, gentlemen, the same virtues which made her a good mother, made her a good daughter.

the evil tree brings forth no good fruit, and that men do not "gather grapes of thorns and grapes of thistles," and it is this girl whom, with all her faults, we would do well to remember, by a verdict of guilty—chaining the living to the dead. Mr. Hagner alluded to the case taken by the jury, and he alluded to the case taken by the jury.

an illustration of the greater care that should be given to the case.

A MATTER OF LIFE AND DEATH.

He illustrated his position by practical examples, which brought the principle home, and which were very convincing. He then proceeded to say that, if there is needed a higher proof of this good character, it is found in one circumstance that has transpired before our eyes.
